Together, culture and education have the potential to expand knowledge and ways of knowing, diversify educational trajectories, empowering individuals and communities across social, economic and environmental dimensions, and thereby promoting inclusive, peaceful, and sustainable societies.

However, the potential of the culture-education nexus is yet to be fully grasped. There is a need to change our understanding of how education and culture relate. UNESCO, in its efforts to bring the two areas together, has published a series of articles and papers on the intersections of education and culture and is currently working on a revised Global Framework for Culture and Arts Education and a Vision Paper that recognizes, revitalizes, re-imagines and articulates ways in which culture and education are mutually transformative. The Paper addresses contemporary global, social and educational challenges, including cultural hegemonies and limitations in existing education and cultural sector systems.

This session will provide the opportunity to present a new vision for education and culture by discussing why and how integrating culture into education improves the quality, the effectiveness and outcomes of education, and the ways in which education can help promote, protect and strengthen culture.
