This session aims to investigate pedagogy, social movements, and democracy within the project of social transformation. As the exploitation of the 'raced' and gendered working class continues to intensify, educators must consider the role of pedagogy within the context and format of social movements. Complicating this task, the academic discourse which examines neoliberalism and conservative authoritarianism fails to adequately address the significance of Capital. Of additional concern, both elitism and anti-elitism in academia, conferences and elsewhere divide and isolate the voices of active contributors.

How should economic, social and political actions and threats from capitalist governments be met? How does one look at the idea of pedagogy itself within the context/format of social movements? What role can educators and indeed all intellectuals play in acts and organizations of resistance? How are solidarity networks built? What is the impact of social media on civic engagement, ideological hegemony and resistance and democracy?
